

Grounded, not going anywhere?

Last week I realized exactly how accustomed to the ease of travelling internationally I have become. With regular low cost air fares, I split my time between the UK and Europe as easily as commuting from the suburbs into the city.

For me, air travel has become as routine as taking the train to visit friends, and armed with my laptop, mobile phone and a data connection, I can be just as effective in the office, at home, or even stranded at a little longer than expected at a friends house Holland.

Using the IP based, Unified Communication products from CommuniGate Systems, I can take my work with me wherever I go. So to me it doesn't really matter where I am, I can still keep in contact with colleagues, hold meetings with customers, negotiate new contracts and meet deadlines whether in London, San Francisco or The Hague.

However, a great number of businesses aren't as fortunate. Many are still stuck in the office-bound mode of operation, and therefore face significant business disruption when the unexpected occurs; whether that is freak weather storms, natural disasters, terrorist incidents or a cloud of Icelandic volcano ash. But, with the proper planning and tools, productivity need not be affected.

With IP technologies such as mobile email, Voice-over-IP and collaboration software, businesses can stay connected and productive no matter where they are. And best of all, it is neither difficult nor expensive to enable a business with this capability. In fact businesses could provide the kind of location-independent productivity tools I enjoy for significantly less than the cost of a train ticket from Brussels to London.
